Mindful Morning Routine

My Mourning Routine

Living with cancer doesn't mean mourning. Mourning usually refers to mourning someone who has passed. But when you have cancer, you often find yourself mourning the person you used to be. You may find yourself mourning the person you used to be before you were diagnosed with cancer. You may find yourself mourning the person you used to be before you were diagnosed with cancer.

It's okay to feel grief. Grief is a natural response to loss. It's okay to feel sad. It's okay to feel angry. It's okay to feel scared. It's okay to feel lonely. It's okay to feel like you're not in control. It's okay to feel like you're not strong enough. It's okay to feel like you're not good enough. It's okay to feel like you're not smart enough. It's okay to feel like you're not beautiful enough. It's okay to feel like you're not special enough. It's okay to feel like you're not enough.

The routine that develops over time is a way of coping with the loss. It's a way of finding meaning in the pain. It's a way of finding hope in the darkness. It's a way of finding love in the loneliness. It's a way of finding strength in the weakness. It's a way of finding courage in the fear. It's a way of finding faith in the doubt. It's a way of finding peace in the chaos. It's a way of finding joy in the sorrow. It's a way of finding life in the death.

These small, everyday steps create a foundation of strength and resilience as they go.
