The Woodman: A Romance of the Times of Richard III

George Payne Rainsford James, 2020-09-28 There was a sloping piece of ground looking to the south east with a very small narrow rivulet running at the bottom On the opposite side of the stream was another slope as like the former as possible only looking in the opposite direction Titian and Vandyke and some other painters have pleased themselves with depicting in one picture the same face in two or three positions and these two slopes looked exactly like the two profiles of one countenance Each had its little clumps of trees scattered about Each had here and there a hedgerow somewhat broken and dilapidated and each too had towards its northern extremity a low chalky bank through which the stream seemed to have forced itself in those good old times when rivers first began to go on pilgrimages towards the sea and like many other pilgrims that we wot of made their way through all obstacles in a very unceremonious manner Over these two slopes about the hour of half past eleven post meridian the moon was shining with a bright but fitful sort of splendour for ever and anon a light fleecy cloud like a piece of swansdown borne by the wind would dim the brightness of her rays and cast a passing shadow on the scene below Half an hour before indeed the radiant face of night's sweet queen had been veiled by a blacker curtain which had gathered thick over the sky at the sun's decline but as the moon rose high those dark vapours became mottled with wavy lines of white and gradually her beams seemed to drink them up It may be asked if those two sloping meadows with their clumps of trees and broken hedgerows and the little stream flowing on between them was all that the moonlight showed That would depend upon where the eye of the observer was placed Near the lower part of the valley formed by the inclination of the land nothing else could be perceived but walk half way up towards the top on either side and the scene was very much altered Gradually rising as the eye rose appeared stretching out beyond the chalky banks to the north through which the rivulet came on a large grey indistinct mass stretching all along from east to west the rounded lines of which together with some misty gaps taking a blueish white tint in the moonlight showed it to be some ancient forest lying at the distance probably of two or three miles from the spot first mentioned
