After the initial period of adjustment, the economy has been growing steadily, with inflation remaining low and stable. The government has been able to maintain a budget surplus, which has helped to reduce the national debt. The country's foreign exchange reserves have also increased, providing a buffer against external shocks. The government has also implemented a range of structural reforms, including privatisations and deregulation, which have helped to improve the efficiency of the economy. The government has also been successful in its efforts to combat corruption and improve the rule of law. The country's political system is now more stable and transparent, which has helped to attract foreign investment and promote economic growth.
