

Unity of Command Vs. Unity of Direction

Unity of Command	Unity of Direction
1. It implies that a subordinate should receive orders and instructions from one boss only.	1. It means "one unit and one plan" for the group of activities having the same objective. The activities of a group should be directed towards its common goals.
2. This principle is related to the functioning of personnel.	2. This principle is related to the functioning of a department or the organisation as a whole.
3. Unity of command is necessary to fix responsibility of each subordinate.	3. Unity of direction is necessary for sound organisation.
4. Unity of command avoids conflicts in the undertaking or enterprise.	4. Unity of direction avoids duplication of efforts and wastage of resources.

sound organisation whereas unity of command is necessary to fix responsibility of the subordinates and to avoid conflicts in the enterprise.

Positive Effects :

- (i) All activities are directed towards organisational goals.
- (ii) There is better coordination throughout the organisation.

Adverse Effects of Violation :

- (i) There would be confusion in the minds of the workers.
- (ii) There would be duplication of efforts and wastage of resources.
- (iii) Lower efficiency may result because of lack of coordination.

4. Subordination of Individual Interest to General Interest. The business enterprise is superior to its individual employees. The interests of the business organisation must prevail upon the personal interests of the individuals. This principle calls for reconciliation of goals of individuals with those of the organisation. When the individual and the organisational interests conflict, the latter must prevail. The employees should subordinate their interests to the general interests of the concern. The goals of the concern must not be sacrificed for the promotion of personal interests of individuals.

For example, a worker has the goal of earning maximum wages by increasing the number of units to be produced. But in doing so he finds that there is a greater wastage of material and greater risk of breakdown of machinery. Since these are against the interests of the organisation, the worker should give preference to the interests of the organisation.

Positive Effects :

- (i) Concentration on organisational objectives.
- (ii) Alignment of organisational and individual goals.

Adverse Effects of Violation :

- (i) There might be deviation from organisational goals.
