The chart above offers a quick glimpse into the growth in international ranking organizations over time. It includes league tables launched to address the different types of universities and their missions.

Rankings are influential

Rankings are often the go-to resource for students, parents, researchers, potential faculty members, funders, and other bodies seeking an objective insight into your university's performance and ability.

Why do rankings matter?

Over the past 18 years, international university rankings have grown in visibility and prominence. They can influence:

- How your government measures research excellence for your institution
- Whether an undergraduate or graduate student (and their parents) opt for your university
- Why a company selects you as a partner
- Whether a funding body invests in research at your university

In "Perspectives on rankings from a young university," a recent episode of the Research 2030 podcast, César Wazen, Director of International Affairs, Qatar University, notes his opinion on why rankings matter.

Listen in his own words.

You can hear more of Wazen's insights in the entire episode.

Although rankings are not the sole indicator of your institution's reputation and academic excellence, they provide a quantitative and popular way to benchmark universities nationally, regionally, and globally.

Rankings increase your university's visibility

Since being ranked can increase your university's visibility and profile, it is a tool to promote your visibility. In turn, rankings help your audiences, e.g., students, potential faculty, potential collaborators and more.
