kindly hand reaching down from heaven Five minutes later the taxicab drew up in front of a hotel The unknown stepped out took a leather purse from his pocket and carefully counted out in silver two dollars and twenty cents which he poured into the chauffeur's palm Thank you sir You are an American Sure I was born in this burg Like the idea Huh The idea of being an American I should say yes This is one grand little gob o mud believe me It's going to be dry in a little while and then it will be some grand little old brick Say let me give you a tip The gas in this joint is extra if you blow it out Grinning the chauffeur threw on the power and wheeled away into the fog His late fare followed the vehicle with his gaze until it reached the vanishing point then he laughed An American cockney He turned and entered the hotel He marched resolutely up to the desk and roused the sleeping clerk who swung round the register The unknown without hesitance inscribed his name which was John Hawksley But he hesitated the fraction of a second before adding his place of residence London

A pall of fog lay over the world so heavy that it beaded the face and hands and deposited a fairy diamond dust upon wool. The station lights had the visibility of stars and like the stars were without refulgence, a pale golden aureole perhaps three feet in diameter and beyond nothing. The few passengers who alighted and the train itself had the same nebulosity of drab fish in a dim aquarium. Among the passengers to detrain was a man in a long black coat. The high collar was up. The man wore a derby hat well down upon his head after the English mode. An English kitbag, battered and scarred, swung heavily from his hand. He immediately strode for the station wall and stood with his back to it. He was almost invisible. He remained motionless until the other detrained passengers swam past until the red tail lights of the last coach vanished into the deeps; then he rushed for the exit to the street.
