Translational Pain Research: Comparing preclinical studies and clinical pain management. Lost in translation? Jianren Mao, 2006 Basic science and clinical pain research is particularly challenging for several reasons First pain is a subjective experience in response to nociception that follows actual or potential tissue damage Since the ability to respond to this warning signal is essential for our survival the nociceptive system that produces and transmits nociceptive signals is remarkably redundant and involves diffuse regions of the central nervous system Second unlike other sensory modalities pain is a multi dimensional experience including at least cognitive affective and sensory discriminative components Third pain experiences can be influenced by psychological socioeconomic cultural and genetic predispositions making it exceedingly complicated to study pain and pain modulation The topics covered in this volume are carefully selected and directly related to the daily practice of pain medicine These topics include 1 central mechanisms of pain and pain modulation Dickenson Donovan Rodriguez Matthews and clinical use of ion channel blockers Chen 2 spinal
