

ANSWER

ANSWER: B

Because it will often be difficult to prove or prove to the satisfaction of the court that the "true and necessary" funds are required for their own expenses, if the beneficiary or trustee attempts to disburse these funds it would be considered a breach of trust.

Under the Uniform Act, however, the trustee is not liable for disbursements made in reliance upon the trustee's reasonable belief that such disbursements were justified expenses of the trust.

2. Another consideration is the relationship of the trustee's expenses to the beneficiary's expenses, and how it affects the trustee's liability for the trustee's expenses.

Any such relationship may necessitate a hearing.

3. Another consideration is the nature of the disbursements.

It would be most unusual for a trustee to disburse any amount of money to a beneficiary, unless that beneficiary is clearly entitled to receive that amount under the terms of the trust.

4. The trustee would also be required to determine whether the disbursements are reasonable.

5. Another consideration is the nature of the expenses.

Under the Uniform Act, however, the trustee is not liable for expenses that are not reasonable.

6. Another consideration is the relationship of the trustee's expenses to the beneficiary's expenses.

7. Another consideration is the relationship of the trustee's expenses to the beneficiary's expenses.

8. Another consideration is the relationship of the trustee's expenses to the beneficiary's expenses.
