Population Distribution: The Middle East

Population distribution and the location of major settlements are important and interesting subjects in geography. Population distribution is the way people are spread out over the earth. This is not uniform. People are more concentrated in some areas than in others. Population distribution is affected by many factors, including natural resources, climate, and economic opportunities.

There are three main types of population distribution: uniform, clustered, and dispersed. Uniform distribution is when people are spread out evenly across an area. Clusters are groups of people that live together. Dispersed distribution is when people are spread out across an area.

Most of the Middle East consists of dry deserts. People do not live throughout most of these deserts, especially where there is little rainfall. Because of this, most people live in cities and towns. People typically live along the coastlines and in the green oases.

Population distribution in the Middle East is affected by geography, climate, and resources. People tend to live in areas with more rainfall, in areas with green oases, and in areas with more resources. These factors affect the way people live in the Middle East. People tend to live in areas with more rainfall, such as the Mediterranean region and the Persian Gulf. People tend to live in areas with more resources, such as the Middle East and North Africa. People tend to live in areas with more natural resources, such as the Middle East and North Africa.
