My Mourning Routine

Living with cancer, death, and bereavement means every waking moment is tinged with the knowledge that the day may be the last. There is no chance of tomorrow, and the only consolation may be that death will quickly end your pain.

It is hard to give gratitude planning to prevent that hope. The focus on the unknown adds an unknown that the day may be the last. Every day may end with complete despair and the desire to end suffering and heartache.

The routine that develops, however, is a way of coping with living and not in great haste, since death is not expected. The mind desperately searches for every one of potential future moments, planning a somewhat craft to the end.

These small, important steps create a foundation of security and comfort as they go.
