The deckboard drive is controlled by the steering wheel, the components of which are interconnected through an internally mounted steering rail 1, which is fixed to the steering column 2. The position of the steering rail is independent of the input to which the drive is. The lower parts of the valve rods are located in a steering housing 3, which is fixed to the upper plate housing of the deckboard drive. The steering angle of the drive is about 30° from the steering position.

To improve the response of the outboard drive, it is designed with an asymmetrical shaft design, which is specific to the steering system. The shaft design is based on the shape of the steering yoke and consists of an elastic motor which operates a pull rod on the power yoke through the medium of a control pin. This Rod retains the steering yoke and lifts the shaft to its topsteering position. As soon as the drive has achieved its fully topsteering or fully downsteering position, the elastic motor pulls out automatically. When being lowered, the drive automatically returns to the neutral position of the steering wheel. The maximum topsteering angle is about 30°. The outboard drive remains in the neutral topsteering position. This makes turning forward possible with the sail partly topsteering for short periods at low speed.
