 - a. The price of imported oil does not reflect the increased political risk by effectively subsidizing authoritarian regimes like those in Saudi Arabia.
 - b. The tax would estimate the marginal damage (e.g., the increased instability in the Middle East, etc.) by importing oil from Saudi Arabia.
 - c. The supply of TGRs is vertical at 104.5 billion if government seeks to reduce consumption of gasoline to 104.5 billion. Consumers must have one TGR in order to buy one gallon of gasoline, plus they must pay the price at the pump. Limiting TGRs effectively limits the demand for gasoline, so the price per gallon will fall, but consumers must have TGRs in order to purchase gasoline. If the market price of one TGR is $0.75, this means that supply and demand intersect at $0.75, as shown in the graph. This kind of program curbs consumption without giving government more revenue because consumers are purchasing the TGRs from each other. However, the total amount of TGRs is limited by government. Those consumers seeking to purchase more gasoline than allowed by the initial allocation of TGRs can purchase additional TGRs from other consumers at the market price of $0.75. By choosing to use a TGR to purchase gasoline, a consumer incurs an opportunity cost equal to $0.75 since they cannot sell the TGR once it has been used.

5. The use of the drug to treat sick cows leads to a positive externality (the benefit enjoyed by air travelers) as well as a negative externality (the costs created by a larger number of rats and feral dogs). Banning the drug might raise or lower efficiency, depending on whether the positive externality is larger or whether the negative externality is larger.
