1.1 PROBLEMS

Problems in the field of mobile communications

- 1.1.1. Interference: is a negative effect that limits the quality of mobile communications. Interference occurs when multiple signals from different transmitters overlap in a particular area. The signals should not have the same frequency or similar frequencies.
- 1.1.2. Signal propagation: is how signals are sent and received between the transmitter and receiver. The propagation medium can affect the signal quality. For example, when the signal passes through a wall or a mountain, the signal may be attenuated. This means that the signal's power is reduced. The signal may also be reflected or scattered by the medium. This can cause interference or fading. Fading is when the signal's power fluctuates over time.
- 1.1.3. Multipath fading: is when signals take different paths to reach the receiver. This can lead to interference between the signals. The receiver may receive multiple signals at different times, which can cause interference. This can be reduced by using diversity techniques, such as beamforming or space-time coding.
- 1.1.4. Inter-cell interference: is when signals from one cell interfere with signals from other cells. This can happen when cells are close together. The signals from different cells may overlap in the same frequency band. This can cause interference between the cells. This can be reduced by using frequency reuse or beamforming.
- 1.1.5. Signal-to-noise ratio (SNR): is the ratio of the signal power to the noise power. It is an important metric for mobile communications. A higher SNR means better signal quality. Noise can come from various sources, such as thermal noise or interference from other cells.
- 1.1.6. Latency: is the time it takes for a signal to travel from the transmitter to the receiver. Latency is important for real-time applications, such as video streaming or gaming. High latency can lead to poor user experience. Latency can be reduced by using low-latency technologies, such as 5G or millimeter波段通信.
